(Compare No. 273 of my collection 1882-83 (Report p. 124). Weber, xvii. 56, is right in pointing out that the No. of verses ascribed in that entry to the Thiravaliyâ and the Pedhiya involves some error. In that MS. the Thiravaliyâ is given in two parts, the one ending with v. 32, and the other ending with the आभिणिबोहियनाणं verse. This second part is wrongly numbered 9 to 27 instead of 1 to 17. In all 49 vv. The Peḍhiyâ has 81 vv. In No. 240 of the same collection, the Thiravaliyâ is given as consisting of vv. 1 to 51, the आभिणिबोहियनाणं verse being included in it as it is also in No. 173. In No. 240 that verse is written out again as No. 1 of the Pedhiyâ, and the Peḍhiyâ has 79 vv.)

BOMBAY BRANCH

OF THE

ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

EXTRA NUMBER.

A Third Report of Operations in search of Sanskrit MSS. in the Bombay Circle. April 1884—March 1886. By Professor Peterson.

I hope to give in this report some account of the work done during a period extending over two official years, or from April 1884 to March of the present year.

The greater part of the October vacation of 1884 was devoted to the preparation of my Second Report. In the middle of the month I went from Mount Abu to Gwalior. In response to a request to be furnished with a list of desiderata, Professor Roth of Tübingen had kindly sent a memorandum of the books he most wished me to look out for, at the head of which stood a second copy of the Atharvaveda in the Paippalâda Śâkhâ. It has long been believed that a good copy of this book does exist at Gwalior. It would have been a great gratification to me to secure it, and put it at the disposal of Professor Roth, as it would be a pleasure now to begin this record with an account of a success. But the journey resulted in nothing. I had not been at the pains to secure introductions, and to make the object of my visit known beforehand. I mention this probable cause of my failure, because, though I spent to no purpose much time and patience in the Travellers' Bungalow at Morar, with nothing even to read but a certain Catalogus Codicum Sanscriticorum, I have no reason in my experience to conclude that the book is not there. I will try again some day. Meanwhile, in the hope that some other may succeed where I failed, I will give below in a note, from Professor Roth's letter to me, the points of difference between the ordinary Atharvaveda and this recension of that text.* If Sir Lepel Griffin uses his great influence there to put scholars in possession of the Gwalior copy of the book, he will do learning a service.

On my way back to Bombay from Mount Abu in November, I spent hree days at Ahmedabad, during which I went over the libraries of Râjendrasûri and Śântisûri, two Jain teachers then residing in that own. An account of my visit to Râjendrasûri (among whose books found an excellent copy of Kshemendra's Kavikanthâbharana and ...chityavichâracharchâ) has already appeared.† Śântisûri is a reformer, and seemed to me to be paying the penalty of a religious reformer in an empty lecture hall. He received me with very great courtesy, and gave me free access to his travelling library.* The Ahmedabad extracts in the Second Appendix to this Report, pp. 285 to 324, which I will now proceed to notice, are from books lent to me by these sûris, and detained—as might be confessed in some other cases also—somewhat longer than was originally intended by either party. I have to tender the sûris my very hearty thanks.

The Gâthâsahasrî of Samayasundara.

The 'Collection of one thousand Gâthâs' from which our first extracts are taken was composed in Samvat 1686, or A.D. 1630, by Samayasundara, pupil of Sakalachandra, pupil of Jinachandra. These names enable us to identify our author with the Samayasundara who wrote the Kalpalatâ, a commentary on the Kalpasûtra.† His present work is, as the title indicates, made up entirely of quotations from older texts. I have given first a group of verses cited here from a Gachchhotpattiprakîrnaka,—of which the verse referring to the sack of Valabhi is quoted, but without any reference, by Merutunga in his Prabandhachintâmani, a book written in A.D. 1305. The Gachchhotpatti tract is therefore older than Merutunga, how much older must remain uncertain. The verses give dates for some important events in early Jain annals as follows :—

V. 96. " Five hundred and forty-three years after Vîra was perfected, is the date of the rise of the Terâsia heresy in Antaranjiâ.

V. 97. "When six hundred years and nine had passed since Vîra was perfected, the Bodîana heresy arose in the city Rahavîra.

V. 98 " When twelve hundred and half a hundred years had passed since Vîra reached eternal rest, living in temples and monasteries was sanctioned by an ease-loving generation.

V. 99. "When five hundred years from the Jina Vîra had passed away, the Blessed Vaïra was conceived in the womb of Sunandâ.

V. 100. "Five hundred and thirty-five years after Vikrama,

* All India's peripatetic teachers carry about with them a selection of their books.

† Jacobi, Kalpa Sûtra, Introduction, p. 26. " The date is not given, but it may be inferred from the author's statement that Jinachandra, the guru of his own gurû Sakalachandra, lived under Akbar." Jacobi gives Samvat 1699 as the date of his manuscript. Is it not rather, or also, the date of the composition of the work.

Haribhadrasûri our Sun reached eternal rest. May he give us happiness and prosperity!

V. 101. "Thirteen hundred years and more from Vîra's death, śrî Bappabhattisûri, the crest jewel of the learned, was born.

V. 102. "When seventy-five with three hundred years from Vikrama had passed away, the sack of Valabhî took place.

V. 103. "When one hundred and eight years from the time of śrî Vikramâditya the king had passed away, Jâvadi set up the stone image in Śatrunjaya.

V. 104. "When six hundred years and nine had passed, Rayana set up the jewelled image in a golden shrine on the Revaya Hill.

V. 105. "When twelve hundred and fifty years had passed from Vardhamâna, Sâisûri made the ordinance of the first of the (two) fourteenths."

The four gâthâs which follow, p. 285*, have been published already by Jacobi† from the Sandehavishaushadhi, a commentary on the Kalpasûtra, written by Jinaprabhamuni in Samvat 1364, or A.D. 1308. Jinaprabha says that they are found "in the Tîrthodgâra and other works." As Samayasundara's own commentary on the Kalpalatâ is, according to Jacobi, a mere abstract from the Sandehavishaushadhi, he may have been indebted to that work for these gâthâs here.

The verses are held to have an important bearing on an obscure text of the Kalpasûtra. The life of Mahâvîra contained in that work, which is the only account of the great Jain teacher we have, ends with the words, "samaṇassa bhagavao Mahâvîrassa jâva‡ savvadukkhappahîṇassa, nava vâsasayaiṃ vikkaṃtâiṃ, dasamassa ya vâsasayassa ayam asîme saṃvachchhare kâle gachchhai, vâyâṇaṃtare punaḥ ayaṃ teṇaue saṃvachchhare kâle gachchhai iti."

"From the time when the ascetic, the Blessed Mahâvîra, thus yielded to Time, went away from us and departed, having cut the bonds of birth and eld and death, being perfected, awakened, delivered, having made an end and obtained full salvation, freed from all sorrow, nine hundred years are gone, and of the tenth hundred of years this year

‡ i. e. yâvat. The word indicates that between the words Mahâvîrassa and savvadukkhappahîṇassa we are to supply the remaining words of a formula which has already occurred in the book. I have given them in the translation.

that is going is the eightieth. Or, as another reading has it, this year that is going is the ninety-third."

Nothing, it will be seen, could be more explicit, and we could have borne with the slight discrepancy between the two readings, if the writer, whoever he was, had told us to what event his dates refer. This, however, he does not do: and the Jains do not know. From Jinaprabha and the commentators who came after him we learn that "for some cause or other" the words are not explained at all in the Chûrni,* the oldest commentary on the Kalpasûtra to which we find any reference made. But in commentaries presumably later than the Chûrni our authorities found the explanation iyam vâchanâ jâtâ (Sandehavishaushadhi) or asyâ vâchanâyâ (Kiranâvali). They record however a variety of opinions as to what is to be understood by the word vâchanâ here, and they note that our verses are cited by those who uphold the reading "ninety-third," and who believe that the event which made the year 993 memorable was the removal of the Paryushanâ by Kâlakâchârya, from the fifth to the fourth day of the month Bhadrapada. Our verses run as follows:

V. 6. "When nine hundred and ninety-three years had passed from Vardhamâna then† was the paryûshanâchaturthî established by Kâlagasûri.

V. 7. "And in that year 993 the rule of twenty days, as also that of spending five days‡ only, was rescinded by order of the Assembly.

Vv. 8 and 9. "And in 993 the Holy One (i. e. Kâlakâchârya) was at the request of the Assembly summoned by King Śâlavâhana, the Paryushanâ was shifted to the fourth, the châturmâsya to the fourteenth, and the fourfold assembly was constitnted: this they hold for the true practice."§

* For all that is known of the Chûrṇi on the Kalpasûtra, see Jacobi, Introduct. p. 25.

† To = tatas. Jacobi reads Kâlayasûrîhiṃto as one word (Abl. pl.) but the anusvâra is against the metre.

‡ Did the one rule refer to the rainy season and the other to the rest of the year? For pañchagahâṇîi (pañchayahâṇîe, Appendix. p. 303) Jacobi has pañchaga-hâṇî ya. I do not feel certain of the construction, but in Jacobi's reading one or other ya seems superfluous.

§ The construction of the last two verses is of a compressed ungrammatical kind often met with in old Jain mnemonic verses. Compare Leumann's

Among the other events put forward as that referred to in the passage from the Kalpasûtra are the Council of Valabhi, at which Devarddhigani is reported to have reduced to writing, or to their present written shape, the Jain scriptures, and the public reading (vâchanâ) of the Kalpasûtra before king Dhruvasena of Ânandapura to console him on the death of his son. It has not escaped notice that the only natural interpretation of the passage itself, as well as of the old explanation, is that which would see in it the date of the composition of this part of the Kalpasûtra. Taken in that way it cannot of course be reconciled with the tradition which assigns the Kalpasûtra as a whole to Bhadrabâhu, the sixth Thera or Elder after Mahâvîra himself. We must choose, it seems to me, between the passage and the tradition; and the weight of evidence is in favour of the passage. For, assuming that the clear purport of the passage is to give a date for this Life of Mahâvîra, its incorporation with the text itself becomes inexplicable if we accept the tradition, and believe, in accordance with it, that Badrabâhu's authorship of the book had never been lost sight of. That the Chûrnikâra takes no note of the passage may of course be brought forward as showing that it was not in his text. But it is just as likely that the Chûrnikâra saw no difficulty in it. Or, though this seems less likely, he may have been unwilling to call attention to words standing in such direct conflict with a tradition which had obtained currency even in his day.*

The next extract, p. 285, is from a Panchavastuka which I have taken to be Haribhadrasûri's book of that name.† Haribhadra is one of the most interesting figures in the long succession of Jain writers: and as it happens, we shall have frequent occasion to recur to him throughout this Report. Let me notice here only that these verses remarks in his paper, to be referred to immediately, on the schisms of the Jain Church. I am not sure that my rendering is correct. For Sâlâhaṇoṇa, (so also p. 303), Jacobi has Sâlahaṇeṇa which he corrects into Sâlavâhanena. But Sâlâhaṇa, as my books have it, is the right form. Kârio on p. 285 (kâriyam, p. 303) agrees with Jacobi. So also âyaraṇaṃ taṃ (âyaraṇaṃ te p. 303).

* I have not failed to notice that Jacobi, Introduct., p. 23, says, "It need hardly be remarked that the passages containing the dates 980 and 993 A. V. do not refer to the author, but to Devarddhiganin, the editor of the Kalpasûtra." But I see no evidence for this.

† Remove श्रीहरिभद्रसूरिकृते from the colophon. It has been inserted by mistake from my memoranda.

give us his authority, if the book is his, for the following dates :—The first Kâlakasûri was born when 335 years had passed from Vîra. In the year 453 Kâlakaguru took (charge of) Sarasvatî: and in the 470 from Vîra, Vikrama was born.

The next extract, p. 286, from a work called Ganita, gives in three verses a very complete conspectus of the world from the geometer's point of view. Four tilas make a java; four javas make an angula; four angulas make a mushti; four mushtis make a kara; and four karas, or hastas, make a danda. A krośa is two thousand dandas. Four krośas make a yojana. A hundred yojanas make a deśa, and a hundred deśas make a mandala. A hundred mandalas make a khanda. And the earth is made up of nine khandas.

One verse having reference to the "shadowy recollections" the soul may bring with it of its previous states, which it is declared do not in any case extend beyond the ninth previous birth, is given, p. 286, as from the 'Yogavidhi' of the Âchârya Indra, possibly the great grammarian of that name.

The next extract, p. 286, consists of sixteen gâthâs, written out by Samayasundara from the Âvaśyachûrni, and containing the account given there of the seven great schisms of the Jain church. For a commentary on these gâthâs Samayasundara refers the reader to a work of his own called the Viśeshasangraha. The gâthâs sadly need a commentary, being as they are mnemonic verses written in a cramped ungrammatical style, which defies translation even where decipherment seems possible. They should be compared with Weber's account of the corresponding passage in the Âvaśyaka itself, and with Leumann's instructive paper on the Jain schisms: Weber's Indische Studien, xvii. pp. 65-67 and 91 to 130.

There can be no reasonable doubt of the great antiquity of the tradition these verses embody, and I therefore venture to give for the English reader Leumann's account of the first two heresies, prefixing as close a version of the gâthâs themselves as I find possible.

Vv. 48-9. The heresy of Jamâli.—" Fourteen years after the true faith had been established by the Jina the heresy of the Bahuratas arose in Śrâvastî. Its founder was Jamâli, the son of Sudarsanâ, elder sister of the Jina. In the garden called Tindu in Śrâvastî. Fifteen thousand adherents. Dhanka refuted him."

According to the commentators Haribhadra and Śântisûri, this first schism in the Jain Church arose in the following wise. Jamâli was nephew and son-in-law of Mahâvîra. With his wife he entered the order, receiving charge of five hundred monks, while his wife was put over a thousand nuns. Being one day ill in the garden called Tinduga in Śrâvastî he bade his monks spread his bed of straw. They were doing so, when he called out, Is it made or is it being made? They answered, It is not made, but is being made. Then he said to himself, The Master teacheth that every act—be it moving, cutting, splitting, burning, dying, killing—is done the moment it is done. But that is clearly not true. For here a bed that is being made is not made, and straw that is being spread is not spread. Therefore an act, be it moving, &c.—is not done so long as it is doing. So he called the monks to him and taught this doctrine. Some believed him, others did not: those who believed him followed him, those who did not sought to argue with him, and when they found no success left him for the Master. Now his wife Priyadarśanâ was at the time living in the house of the potter Dhanka. She visited Jamâli and, for the old love she bore him, let herself be led astray from the truth. Coming back she taught this new faith to her nuns, as also to Dhanka. The potter however said that he could not understand the difference. That night, as Priyadarśanâ was studying, a piece of live coal fell by Dhanka's contrivance on her dress, and burned a hole in it. Seeing this she said, My dress is burnt. But Dhanka said to her: You have just told me that what is being burnt is not burnt. How, say you now that your dress is burnt? The true disciples of the Master may speak of a thing which is being burnt as burnt, but not you. Priyadarśanâ answered, You say well: I deserved this rebuke; then went to her husband, and when she could not turn him from his error left him and went with her nuns to the Master.

Soon afterwards Jamâli met Mahâvîra near the city Champâ. He went up to him and said, Many of your monks come back to you having fallen unto error. I am made perfect in knowledge. Gautama answered and said, If thou art made perfect in knowledge answer me these two questions. Is the world eternal or not, is the soul eternal or not? Thus questioned by Gautama Jamâli was troubled in mind and could not answer, but stood silent. Then said Mahâvîra: I have many disciples who, although they may have fallen into error, can answer these questions as I shall answer them, yet none of them speak as you do. The world is eternal and not eternal. It is eternal inasmuch as there never was a time when it was not, never is a time when it is not, and never shall be a time when it shall not be. It is not eternal, inasmuch as each of the world's great ages waxes to its allotted limit, wanes and goes to its own place, making room for its successor. So too the soul is eternal and not eternal. It is eternal inasmuch as it never was not, never is not, and never will not be. It is not eternal inasmuch as, when its life in hell is over, it passes into the world of beasts, from thence into the world of men, from thence into the world of gods."

Jamâli however did not believe this teaching. He went unbelieving away from the Master, and after leading himself and others astray with many false notions he died at the end of a long fast without obtaining absolution.

Vv. 50—1. The heresy of Tishyagupta. "Sixteen years after the true faith had been established by the Jina the Jîvapradeśika heresy arose in Vṛishabha's city, in the temple called Gunasilaya in Râjagṛiha. The founder was Tishyagupta, pupil of Vasu, who was versed in the fourteen pûrvas. He was refuted by Mittasiria, native of the city Âmalakappa."

According to Haribhadra, Tishyagupta was thus led into error. He was reading the following passage in the Âyapavâya, one of the pûrvas, which he was studying with his Master Vasu :—'Is it permissible, O Lord, to say that a soul atom is a soul. No: and as little is it permissible to say that two, or three or more soul atoms are a soul, or even that what wants only one atom of its proper complement is a soul. For the soul must be thought of as a perfect whole, made up of atoms resembling those of the air.'

Reading this, Tishyagupta fell into this error :—If the atoms of a soul, when only one is wanting, cannot be called a soul, this last atom must be the soul, since the name soul applies to the whole only when it is added.

The disciples of the Master sought to convince him of his error. But as they could not succeed, he was excommunicated. Leading himself and others astray with many false notions he came one day to the city of Âmalakappa in the Ambasâla forest. A pious layman called Mittasirî was among those whom the report of the arrival of a holy man induced to visit the garden in which Tishyagupta was staying. Mittasirî knew him for a heretic, but greeted him respectfully and listened to his instruction. Then invited him to his house. Tishyagupta went, and found a table laden with all manner of rich food. But of every dish Mittasirî gave him only a crumb. Tishyagupta said to himself, He will give me more afterwards. But when Mittasirî fell at his feet and said, Honour to the holy man who has been my guest: happy am I that thou hast visited me, Tishyagupta exclaimed, What is this? Have you brought me here to insult me? Then said Mittasirî, How have I insulted you? Is it not your theory that a whole consists of its last component atom? If that is right, how can you say you are insulted? I have entertained you in accordance with your own theory, as I feel unable to entertain you in accordance with that of our master Vardhamâna.

His eyes were opened and he said, I have deserved this rebuke. Upon that Mittasirî entertained him properly. Afterwards he did penance for his fault, as did also all his adherents.*

In a gâthâ cited, p. 288, from a Sudarśanakathâ by Devendrasûri of the Chivâlava gachchha, we have a Jain rendering of the text, "No man can serve two masters: Ye cannot serve God and Mammon"—

"No man can walk on two roads at once, or sew with a needle both of whose ends are points. You cannot have both the joys of sense and eternal salvation."

When Samayasundara wrote, in Samvat 1686, śrî Jinarâja was "reigning," and the sûri śrî Jinasâgara had obtained the post of Âchârya. The lineage of this Jinarâja will be noticed further on.†

The Visamvâdaśataka of Samayasundara.

In the Visamvâdaśataka, p. 290, a book written a year earlier, the same author has strung together a century of verses, in which are exhibited the discrepancies to be found in the sacred writings. He has not attempted a Harmony.

Meghavijaya's Commentary on the Haimavyâkarana.

In Samvat 1725 = A. D. 1669 certain sûris, by command of the lord of the country, were provided with quarters for the rainy season in the palace at Agarâvara (Agra?), where they employed themselves in drawing up this commentary on Hemachandra's grammar. I have extracted, p. 290, a contemptuous reference to Bhattojidîkshita's Siddhântakaumudî.

Next, p. 291, come two short, highly artificial poems* by an author whose very name has been in peril. Aufrecht mentions a short commentary on the Mâlatîmâdhava by a king called Mâlânka; and BR. sub voce, referring to this, would correct the name Mânânka, occurring as that of an author, to Mâlânka. The identification of the two authors may be right. For Mânânka, like Mâlânka, was a royal commentator. An extract from a short commentary on the Gîtagovinda by "Mânânka Mahîbhuj," will be found at Ap. p. 280. But if one of the two names must be sacrificed it is Mâlânka that must go. Who our author was we do not know. He is quoted by Râyamukuṭa in that writer's commentary on the Amarakośa, A.D. 1431.

Mânânka's Vrindâvana & Meghâbhyudaga kâvyas.

The next four books pp. 292—3, must be dismissed more briefly. In his smaller Dictionary Böhtlingk mentions Chandradûta as the name of a poem. I have observed a quotation from Śivabhadra in the commentary on Rudrata's Kâvyâlankâra by Namisâdhu. The short extract from Haribhadrasûri's commentary on the "Five Sûtras" gives the names of the sûtras in question. Of Bhuvanatungasûri and his Sîtâcharita nothing appears to be known.

Amitagati is the well known name of the Jain author of the Subhâshitaratnasandoha, a book written in Samvat 1050. Compare Colebrooke, Essays, ii, p. 462 and Bhandarkar, Report 1882-3, p. 45. I do not know whether the author of this Dharmaparîkshâ, a poetical treatise on morals, is the same or not. It seems probable that he is. But it will be seen that he himself refers to another Amitagati as among his spiritual ancestors. He traces his descent from Vîrasena, who was succeeded by Devasena, who was succeeded by Amitagati, who was succeeded by Nemishena, who was succeeded by Mâdhavasena. Of this last our author was the pupil. Both the lineage here and the fact that in the invocation there is no special reference to Mahâvira the last of the Tîrthakars, indicate that Amitagati was a Digambara Jain.

The Dharmaparîkshâ of Amitagati.

A Gâthâkośa by Munichandrasûri.

Our next extract, p. 297,* is a selection of verses from a Gâthâkośa compiled by Munichandrasûri. This teacher died in Samvat 1178 (Klatt, Ind. Ant. XI. p. 253). Two years before that date he was engaged in revising the Commentary of his friend Yaśodeva on Jinavallabhagani's Pindaviśuddhi (Kielhorn, Report 1880-1, No. 47 v. 7). An incomplete copy of his Commentary on Haribhadrasûri's Anekântajayapatâkâ† is in our collection (Kielhorn, No. 362, referred to by Klatt). According to a statement in the verses quoted by Klatt from a gurvâvali, Munichandrasûri did much to make Haribhadrasûri's works as a whole intelligible to the readers of his day. The recovery of the commentaries referred to—that on the Anekântajayapatâkâ is the only one mentioned by name—is most desirable.

Munichandra was a purist in Jain practice. In the verses already referred to we are told that his biruda, or title of distinction, was Sauvîrapâyî. The Jain sâdhu or holy man cannot drink water in its natural state. That is full of life, and to drink it would be to incur the guilt of accumulated murder. If the water has been boiled, or used for cleaning rice, the life has gone out of it, and the guilt is his who prepared it, not his who drinks it. Munichandra was one of those who would not allow the pious layman to take that guilt on his soul by boiling water for his teacher's use. He would accept only the water in which rice for ordinary use had been washed (sauvîra), and if that disagreeable draught were not to be had, he went without.

Munichandra does not give us his authors' names. But having regard to the date of his collection, his verses are not without their importance to the student of this branch of the literature. For the general reader, if I have the fortune to possess any such, I give one or two here in English.

"'Love has five arrows' and what, think you, are they? a look, a look again, liking, friendship, love."

"To be over bashful, to be too timid, never to lift her eyes or open her mouth before a man—these be not the signs of a pure heart."

* For the text of that work see Appendix II. p. 191, and compare the remarks which will be made in the corresponding part of this report. No. 229 in the Cambay List, Appendix I. p. 53, is a copy of Haribhadra's Dharmabindu, with a commentary by our author, dated Samvat 1181, or only three years after Munichandrasûri's death.

A Gâthâkośa by Munichandrasûri.

Our next extract, p. 297,* is a selection of verses from a Gâthâkośa compiled by Munichandrasûri. This teacher died in Samvat 1178 (Klatt, Ind. Ant. XI. p. 253). Two years before that date he was engaged in revising the Commentary of his friend Yaśodeva on Jinavallabhagani's Pindaviśuddhi (Kielhorn, Report 1880-1, No. 47 v. 7). "The love of man and wife in youth is beautiful as gold: and like gold though burned it is not consumed: nay, it grows more and more precious when tried in the furnace of the heart."

"Either love not at all or love like that stuff which, however you wash it, will not take another colour."

The Vichâraratnasamgraha of Jayasomasûri.

The Vichâraratnasangraha of Jayasomasûri, pp. 302 to 310, written in Samvat 1657, was found to contain, as its name suggested might prove to be the case, a large number of interesting and important quotations from older books. A copy of this work has been secured for our collection. What follows here is the result of a first gleaning only. Early in the book there is a quotation from a Commentary on the Shadâvaśyaka by Namisâdhu, the last verse of which is as follows:

द्वाविंशत्यधिकैकादशसंवत्सरशैतस्तु विक्रमतः ।
अकृतैनां नमिसाधुः शिष्यः श्रीशालिसूरीणाम् । १ ।

This gives us Namisâdhu's real date, and shows that the reading panchavinśatisamyuktaiḥ of my paper MS. of that writer's Commentary on Rudrata's Kâvyâlankâra (First Report, p. 16) is to be preferred to the corrupt reading of the palm leaf MS.* It also gives us the name of Namisâdhu's teacher.

* Correct the entry in Introduction to Subhâshitâvali, p. 105, where also A. D. is a mistake for Samvat. The true date of Namisâdhu's Commentary on Rudrata is Samvat 1125, A. D. 1069.

This is followed by a quotation from another commentary on the Shadâvaśyakâ by Śrî Chandrasûri, written in Samvat 1232, according to a statement of the author himself, who it will be seen goes into as great detail as Gib bon does with regard to the precise moment when he laid down the pen :

करनयनसूर्यवर्षे प्रातः पुष्पार्कमधुसितदशम्याम् ।
धृतियोगनवमर्क्षे समर्थिता प्रकृतवृत्तिरियम् ॥

Close to this the compiler of the Vichâraratnasangraha gives in full the praśasti of the Munisuvratacharitra, a work written, according to its author's own statement, when the year measured by the suns (12) and the grahas (9) and the vedas (4) had just gone by, i.e. Samvat 1294 = A.D. 1238. The praśasti p. 302 begins with Śrî Vardhamâna of the Châdrakula, a well-known name. His pupil and successor was Jineśvara, whose bandhu or brother in the faith, Buddhisâgara, is referred to. The succession after Jineśvara has been usually represented as passing from Jineśvara to Jinachandra and from Jinachandra to Abhayadeva.* It would appear from this praśasti that it really split along at least three different lines. Jinachandra, Abhayadeva and Jinabhadra all stand in the first line after Jineśvara. And Jinachandra was succeeded not by Abhayadeva but by Devabhadra, and Devabhadra by Devânanda. Devaprabha (write देवप्रभः प्रभुः), Vibudhaprabha and our author Padmaprabha, who wrote this Munisuvratacharitra in Samvat 1294 are apparently referred to as three pupils of Devânanda. The Devabhadra in this succession list is doubtless the Devabhadrâchârya who officiated at Chittore when Jinadatta was installed in the seat of Jinavallabha, Abhayadeva's successor (Bhandarkar, p. 48).

The next quotation, p. 302, from a Kalpâdhyayanadurgapadanirukta by Vinayachandra, should be compared with what has been said above with regard to the Kalpasûtra.

In a Sthavirâvali, p 303, which is given as part of this last book the line of teachers after Mahâvîra is given as Goyama, Suhamma, Jambû, Pabhava, Sijjambhava, Jasabhadda, Sambhûivijaya, Siri Thûlabhadda, Ganahara Mahâgiri, Sûri Balasaha, Sâî, Sâmajjo, Sandilo, Jîyadharo, Ajja Samuddo, Mangu, Nandillo, Nâgahatthî, Revai, Sinha, Khandilla, Himavan, Nâgajjuna, Govinda, Siri Bhûidinna, Lohichcha, Dûsagani, Devaddhî. The writer then goes back to Ajja

* So for example Klatt, p. 218, and Bhandarkar, Report 1882-3, p. 45.

Suhatthî who was, with the ganahara Mahâgiri, pupil of Thûlabhadda, and traces the descent of his schism through Dinna, Indadinna, Sîhagiri, Vaïrasâmî.* The longer list here agrees with that given by Weber, Ind. Stud. XVII, p. 7 as standing at the head of the Nandi sutra.

Vinayachandra wrote his short commentary in the year from Vikrama 1325 = A.D. 1269. He refers to the chûrni and other helps he had been able to use.

The next quotation, p. 304, gives as the closing words and the date, Samvat 1073, of a Sanskrit commentary on the Navapada drawn up by the author of that work himself. The Navapada and Navatattva of Jinachandragani are two well-known Jain works. A copy of the former on palm leaf is noticed at p. 12, Appendix I., and a paper MS. of the latter, with a bhâshya by Abhayadevasûri and a vivarana by Yaśodevasuri, at p. 280, Appendix II. In his note on the words "by the gani Jinachandra" occurring in the last gâthâ of the text of the work, Yaśodevasûri, says that the author indicates by his use of that name that he wrote the book while he was still called Jinachandragani and before assuming his new name of Śrî Devaguptâcharya. In the gâthâ itself Jinachandra says that he wrote the book for his own use, meaning by that, according to Yaśodeva, that he is not to be understood as wishing to put himself in rivalry with the writer of older texts like the Tattvârtha and the Gandhahastibhâshya. The "Mahâtarka" Gandhahasti is referred to in the Shaddarśanavṛitti Hall, Contributions to a Bibliography, &c., p. 166. The sage would seem to have written this Sanskrit commentary on his book when already called Devagupta. But he mentions the old name also. He tells us that he belonged to the Ukeśa gachchha: and he gives Katkadâchârya as the Sanskrit form of the name of his teacher Kakkasûri, as he is called in the gâthâ. For Yaśodeva's descent from Devagupta see Appendix II. p. 283. Yaśodeva wrote his vivarana in Samvat 1174. His first name was Dhanadeva.

This is followed, p. 304, by a quotation from Dhaneśvarasûri's commentary on the Sârddhaśataka of Jinavallabha. The last gâthâ of the text of the work is given. A karma grantha of this name is among the books ascribed to Jinavallabha in Bhandarkar's list, Report p. 48, and we have in our collection, No. 20 of Bhandarkar's list for 1877-78, a commentary on it by Sumatigani, the writer from whom Bhandarkar is quoting in the passage referred to. It will be noticed that the Karmaprakṛiti is here put at the head of the work Jinavallabha is said to have consulted in writing his book. This Sârddhaśataka is to be distinguished from the well-known Ganadharasârddhaśataka of Jinadatta; but I cannot say whether Klatt, p. 248, note 24, is right in saying that both Jinavallabha and his successor Jinadatta wrote tracts entitled Ganadharasârddhaśataka. Dhaneśvarasûri's commentary was composed in Samvat 1171. Jinavallabha himself is stated to have died six months after he was consecrated Sûri by Devabhadrâchârya in Samvat 1167, so that this commentary on his Sârddhaśataka may be the memorial of a friend and pupil.

I give the purport of the quotation from a Śrîvîracharitra which follows, p. 305. Vardhamâna, described as a lamp that lightened the path of salvation for his brother munis, had two chief pupils, like the Sun and Moon, Śrî Sûri Jineśvara† and Buddhisâgara Sûri.* Jinachandrasûri and Abhayadevasûri followed as joint successors. Their successor was Sûri Prasannachandra, and the Garuchandragani, who wrote this book in Samvat 1139, was one of Prasannachandra's pupils.

The date of Prithvîchandrasûri's commentary on the Paryushaṇâkalpa, p. 307, may be gathered from the statement that the author was pupil of Devasenagani, who was pupil of Yaśobhadra, who succeeded Dharmaghosha, the instructor of the king of Śâkhambarî.

The Ashtakavritti, p. 309, was a work written by Jineśvasasûrî, Samvat 1080 "in the pleasant city of Jâvâla" and done into Sanskrit by his pupil Abhayadeva.

Dharmaghosha's Yamakastuti.

For Dharmaghosha's Yamakastuti beginning Jaya Vṛishabha— p. 310, see Klatt, p. 255. The sage is there said to have died in Samvat 1357. Somatilaka, who stands second in succession to Dharmaghosha, and who died Saṁvat 1424, caps Dharmaghosha's performance here with a verse which is capable of four different interpretations. (Correct headings in the Appendix accordingly.)

Yogaratnamâla by Nâgârjuna.

A copy of the Yogaratnamâlâ of Nâgârjuna, p. 313, is in the Bodleian Collection, and the book is described by Aufrecht, p. 322. "This tract, containing 140 âryâ verses, and giving an account of various magic arts, and of poisons compounded of plants, bones, and other substances, seems to be an epitome of a much larger work, which tradition assigns to the same Nâgârjuna. Compare Weber, Catal. p. 270. The author, whoever he was, acknowledges in the beginning and at the end of his book his obligations to Bhâskara guru." Gunâkara's commentary was written in Samvat 1296.

The Âtmabhoda of Jinalâbhasuri.

The Âtmabodha of Jinalâbhasûri, p. 314, is a work written so late as Samvat 1833. The praśasti begins with Udyotana of the line of Sudharma the Ganadhara. Udyotana was succeeded by Vardhamâna: and he by Jineśvara, who "obtained from the king of Pattan in the year 1080 the title of Kharatara, having overthrown his enemies (write वाहिनो in v. 4.)" Jinachandra and the commentator Abhayadeva, here called samvigna or the troubled one (= atiriakta?) were pupils of the founder of the Kharataragachchha. Next came Jinavallabha. He was succeeded by Jinadatta, to whom the goddess Ambâ granted a title, Yugapradhâna, which placed him on a level with the old sages that were so called. Jinadatta was succeeded by Jinachandra; and the earlier part of this praśasti breaks off with a reference to the many eminent men, such as Jinakuśala and Jinaprabha, who arose in this line. In verse 9 we are told how Jainachandra the merciful taught the faith to the Emperor Akbar. Then follows the praśasti proper, if I may so say. Our author traces his descent from Jinasinha, who was among the spiritual descendants of Akbar's contemporary and teacher. Jinasinha was succeeded by Jinarâja who was succeeded by Jinaratna, who was succeeded by Jainachandra, who was succeeded by Jinasaukhya, who was succeeded by Jinabhakti (write मौलिपदे in v. 12). Our author Jinalâbha was Jinabhakti's pupil; and he finished his book in Samvat 1833 = A. D. 1777, being at the time in the pleasant bindira called Manara or Śrîmanara. Bindira here is the word we Anglo-Indians know as bunder.

I can only refer in passing to the next two books. It should be noticed that Vardhamânagani, who wrote the Kumâravihârapraśasti kâvya, p. 316, is not the great sage of that name to whom we have to make constant reference. The present writer is a pupil of Hemachandra, whose favour he enjoyed along with that of the Chaulukya king and the minister Vâgbhata. This is the author of the book on alankâra, who is known to have written a poem on Nemi's nirvâna, in which eulogistic reference is made to Jayasinha and the city of Pattan. Compare also the closing verses of the Vâgbhatâlankâra itself as given by Aufrecht, Cat. p. 214. Somachandra, the author of the Kathâmahodadhi is well known as the writer of a commentary on Kedârabhatta's Vrittaratnâkara. Somachandra was pupil of Ratnaśekhara, and wrote this book in Samvat 1504.

A Commentary on the Kâvyprakâsa by Mânikyachandrasûri.

Of making commentaries on the Kâvyaprakâśa in India there would appear to have been no end. The present, p. 320, is a well-known one by a Jain writer. Notice that his text does not seem to have included the itesha mârgo verse.* Mânikyachandrasûri carries back the account of his descent to Śîlabhadrasûri That sage was succeeded by Bharateśvara in whom the Śântarasa, as it were, neglected by Bharata, took up its abode. Vaïrasvâmin succeeded (write अनु प्रद्योतनं in v. 4). Next came Nemichandra, who overturned the doctrine of Kanâda. Our author studied under Nemichandra, and was pupil of his successor Sâgarendu. He wrote in Samvat 12– –.

Dvâśrayamahâkâvya by Hemachandra with Author's commentary.

A Palm leaf manuscript of Hemachandra's Dvâśrayamahâkâvya, p. 322, is in our collection and has been described by Kielhorn, Report No. 22. The present copy, which extends to the eighth sarga only, includes the author's commentary on his work. Scholars will be glad to learn that Shankar Pandit has undertaken to prepare for the Bombay Sanskrit Series an edition of the Prâkrit chapter of this important book.

A Commentary on the Meghadûta by Janârdana.

It will be noticed that Janârdana in this Commentary on the Meghadûta, p. 324, (write मिताक्षरैव्यप्रमिताक्षरार्थं in v. 2) refers to three previous commentators, by name Sthiradeva, Vallabha and Âsaha. This last is probably the Jain writer who will be referred to later in this report under the name of Âsada. The commentator Vallabha is well known. Of Sthiradeva nothing is known.

Haribhadrasûri's commentary on the Yogabindu, p. 327, Siddhasena's Arhatstava and Umâsvâtivâchaka's Pûjâvidhiprakarana, p. 328, can only be noticed. The Vairutyastavana of Âryanandila, p. 329, is a book which is frequently referred to. In the extracts from Indranandi's Nigamastavana will be found the names of a vast number of tracts called by the Jains Upanishads.

TOUR IN RAJPUTANA.

In the Christmas vacation of 1884-5, I made a short tour in Eastern Rajputana, visiting Boondi, Kotah and Jhalra Pathan. These places lie off the beaten track of travellers in India, and the only trace I came across of a visit to any of them similar in character to my own was an antique celestial globe which is treasured in the palace of Kotah as the gift of Wilkins! That I was able to cover so much ground as I did in the short time available was due entirely to the kindness of Sir Edward Bradford, the Governor General's Agent in Rajputana, and to that of the Political Officers resident in these States, who gave our small party a true Rajputana welcome, and spared no trouble to ensure the success of my tour.

Commentary on the Kâvyaprakâśa by Ravi.

The first Boondi extract, p. 332, is from from an incomplete copy of the Madhumatî, a commentary on the Kâvyaprakâśâ which is referred to, for example, by Kamalâkara. Its author, Ravi, tells us that he was the son of one Ratnapâni, who was the son of Achyuta, minister of Śivasinha, king of Mithila. Ravi refers to the Kâvyadarpana, a work of the same character as his own, by his father Ratnapâni, as also to the better known Bhâskara* and other commentators on this difficult text.

Jagannâth's Prânâbharana, p. 333, referred to by Burnell in his Tanjore Catalogue No. 159, has now been printed in the Kâvyamâlâ.† Tripâthin Rudraśarman's Chandîvilâsanâtaka, p. 334, doubtless represents in itself two of the dramas unknown by inspection to Professor Wilson, which Hall had seen—‡ a Chandîcharita by Rudra Tripâthin, and a Chandîvilâsa by an unknown author.

A Commentary on the Nalodayakâvya by Râma Ṛishi.

This commentary on the Nalodaya, p. 334, gives us the real name of the author of a poem which has often been erroneously attributed to Kâlidâsa. Ravideva was the writer of the Nalodaya.

This Commentary on it was written by Râma Ṛishi, one of three sons of Vriddhavyâsa, in the fortress called Pattan, when Shah Selim was Sultan and Râjaśalya was king, Bhojarâja being heir apparent. The date of his work is given as Samvat 1664 = A. D. 1608.

Râma Ṛishi's father Vridha Vyâsa lived in the city Dindavâna. As an interpreter of the Bhâgavata he was the equal of Srîdhara. His other two sons were Nimbâditya and Harivanśa.

Murârivijayanâtaka and a Prâkritachandrikâ by Kṛishnakavi.

The Murârivijayanâtaka is one of the up to that time unknown dramas which Weber found mentioned in the printed catalogue of the MSS. of the Bengal Asiatic Society.* The author is Kṛishna, or Kṛishnabhatta, otherwise called Bhaṭṭabhaṭṭâraka, son of Bhatta Nṛisinha. He is to be identified with the Kṛishnapandita, a long extract from whose Prâkrit grammar follows at p. 342.

The Kavikarpatikarachanâ, p, 340, a Gradus ad Parnassum for lazy poets, is known to Böhtlingk, smaller Dictionary, as the Kavikarpatî. The name of the author is given in this MS. as Kavirâja Śankadvâra. He is doubtless the same as the Kavirâja Śankhadhara who wrote the Latakamelakaprahasana, Second Report, pp. 57 and 122. The Prâkritasutra which follows is in two parts, one treating of Prâkrit generally, with the exception of the Paisâchî dialect or a Paisâchivarjaprâkritasûtra, the other dealing separately with the Śauraseni dialect, Magadhi in its two varieties, and the Paiśâchî and Apabhranśa tongues. The Naishadhânandanâtaka is another of the dramas referred to by Hall in the passage already cited, Introduction to Daśarûpa, p. 30, note. In the Padyâmritatarangiṇî the verse आख्याते हसितं is ascribed to a Kshemendra. The author was a great grandson of Vijayakoshtha.

The Bhâvaśataka of Nâgarâja.

Nâgarâja's Bhâvaśataka, p. 338, has been described by Bhandarkar, Report, p. 9, who obtained a copy of it for our collection. "It consists of a hundred and one verses, some of them in the Prâkrit, in each of which a certain person is represented to be doing a certain thing in a certain condition, and the reason why he or she does so, or the inner sense of the verse, is meant to be found out by the reader. It is however given at the end of the verse." From No. 97 on there is a praśasti by another writer than the author of the book, according to which Nâgarâja was the son of Jâlapa, who was the son of Vidyâdhara of the Karpatti gotra.*

It will be convenient to take here two books which follow in the Appendix, though the first is not in its right place there. The Kâmasamûha of Ananta, p. 366, belongs to the library of the Kalyânachandra of Cambay, to be referred to immediately. The book, as Aufrecht, p 218 note, has pointed out, is a late compilation, dating from A D. 1457. Of the verses I have given only three occur in the Subhâshitâvali, वसन्तप्रारम्भे p. 367 = S. No. 1688 (Râjânakalaulaka), किं गतेन p. 370 = S. No. 1748 (Ratimitra), अतसीपुष्प p. 370 = S. 1718.

The last extract in the Appendix, p. 374, gives the full text of Bhattâraka Devasena's Darśanasâra, a Digambara Manual of Doctrines to which reference was made in my Second Report, p. 74. The text is printed from the first copy of the work that fell into my hands, a transcript of a copy at Anhilwâd Pathan.† I have since obtained for Government a copy of this book with a commentary in Hindi (No. 305 of my collection 1884-6). This second copy does not contain the last three verses, Nos. 49 to 51, in the second of which the date of the work is given. But the commentator at the beginning of his remarks states that his author was born in Samvat 951, and wrote this book in Samvat 990.‡ According to the same authority Devasena was author besides of the Bhâvasangraha, the Tattvasâra and Ârâhanâsâra. These three books were written in Prâkrit. His Nayachakra and Âlâpapaddhati were composed in Sanskrit. Lastly he wrote a Dharmasangraha in Sanskrit and Prâkrit. Of these books the Nayachakra has been acquired for Government during the period under report (No. 519 of the present collection).

I give a translation of the first verses of this important tract, adding a few remarks, chiefly from the commentator. The various readings noted below are from the Jeypore copy.

"Paying homage due to Vîra Jinendra, adored of the hosts of heaven, free from stain of error, I write this Darśanasâra (quintessence of doctrine) as it has been said by teachers of old time (1).

* Compare however for these names, and the readings in vv. 97, 98 and 99 generally, Bhandarkar's Report, 1882-3, pp. 9 and 198.

† This was not obtained for Government as stated loc. cit, but only lent to me

‡ So also verse 50 of the text of the Anhilwâd Pathan copy. I gave it wrongly. Samvat 909.

"In Bharata land, in the times of the Tîrthakars, before whom indras and nâgas and garudas bowed their heads, even then there were men who spread false doctrine (2).

"The son's son of Rishabha Jina, whose mind darkened with heresy led him into great error, is placed by the teachers of old time at the head of those who have wandered from the faith (3).

"By him the faith was, for reasons shown, perverted; therefore was it that in the times of the other Tîrthakars also the faith waxed and waned (4).

Eyatta, Sansaiya, Vivarîya, Vinayaja and Mahâmoha (Ajnâna) are the false doctrines denounced by the omniscient ones (5).

"In the time of Śrî Pârśvanâtha, in the city Palâśa, on the Sarayû river, there was a sage of great learning, by name Buddhakîrti, pupil of Pihitâśrava (6).

"This man counted it no sin to eat fish, and so became a great heretic: donning red garments he spread the Eyatta heresy (7).

"There is no life, said he, in flesh; it is like fruit or curds or milk or sugar: therefore those who wish it and eat it are not the worst of sinners (8).

"Wine need not be shunned; as warm water is, so is wine: crying out aloud this doctrine among the people he led the faithful into sin (9).

"One man does a deed, and another man reaps the fruit of it: with this doctrine of his own devising he enticed the people—and went to hell (10).

"One hundred and thirty-six years after the death of Vikrama the king, the Sevada sect arose* in Soreth land, in the city Valabhî (11).

"He devised this doctrine—that women, in their life as women, can be saved, that the kevalins or perfected saints eat, though none could see them eating, and were subject to disease (13).

"That the sage who puts clothes on may be saved, that Vîra was translated from one womb to another, that salvation may be found in every creed, and that what is declared to have life in it should never be eaten. (14).

"These and other false doctrines he made, perverting the scriptures—and thereby plunged his soul in the first hell (15).

I have time and room for a few hurried notes only on this extract from the Darśanasâra. The arch-heretic of V. 3 is of course Mârîchi, son of Bharata, son of Rishabha Jina. The commentator puts the number of heresies that flowed from this great original at 363.* He mentions Kauśika, Kaulkila, Jatila and Śâlankâyana as representative heretics, and gives from the Gomatasâra, the Jnânamârganâ and the Râjamârtanda many details of the various sects. The Eyatta or Ekânta heresy, vv. 6 to 10, he explains as Buddhism, and quotes the Shaddarśanasamuchchaya in illustration of that creed. He speaks of the eight chief divisions of the Buddhists, the Vaibhâshikas, Sautrântikas, Tathâgatas, Mâdhyamikas, Bhautikas, Paindikas, Śûnyakas and Santânikas. Of Buddhist teachers he names Dharmakîrti, Dharmadâsa, Bhuddhadâsa and Amarasinha. Dharmakîrti we know.† Dharmadâsa is, I think, the author of the Upadeśamâlâ (See Index of Books). I find Buddhadâsa's name in Beal's Buddhist Records, I. p. 230. He is stated there by Hiouen Tsang to have been the author of the Mahâvibhâsha Śâstra of the school of the Sarvâstivâdins. Lastly Amarasinha is doubtless the great lexicographer. The Sevada sect is the Śvetâmbara division of the Jains, who are here said to have seceded in the year 136 after Vîra's death. The references to them, and the question of their origin generally call, however, for more careful comment than I can give here.‡

A SECOND VISIT TO CAMBAY.

In April 1885, at the close of the College cold weather term, I went to Cambay. On the occasion of my first visit to Cambay it had not escaped our notice that the numbers on the boxes containing old palm-leaf manuscripts, when arranged consecutively, showed many gaps. It was possible that the missing numbers were lost altogether, but I had reason to believe that this was not so, and that a second store-house or hiding place in Śântinâth's temple concealed from us even more books than were then shown.* It will be seen in the sequel that this guess was right, but on the occasion of my visit in 1885, I was met with the most obstinate denial of the existence of any such library. Just as I was leaving, it is true, Mr. Nagindass, who was then still in charge of these books, and believed or professed to believe that he was also the owner, came to me by night to discover if he could perchance make himself rich, and secure a Government appointment for his son, by making over to me books which by day he knew nothing about. I took this as clear proof that I was on the right track, but I had to abandon the effort for the time. I saw, however, a rich collection of paper manuscripts preserved in the library of the late Kalyânachandra in Cambay, and give here some notes on the more important ones. Extracts will be found at pp. 243 to 284.

The "Jaya tihuyana"-stotra of Abhayadevasûri.

The commentator here, p. 245, on the stotra of Abhayadevasûri beginning "Jaya tihuyana—"† gives from old tradition the following account of the circumstances attending the production of that hymn. Abhayadeva in the course of a pilgrimage to the shrines of Gujarath was overtaken by sickness at a place called Śambhânaka. One night he saw in vision the goddess of Jain doctrine, who said, Master, art thou asleep or awake? The sage made painful answer, am awake. Then said she, Arise quickly and unfold my sûtras. But he replied, I cannot. The goddess said, Why sayest thou, thou canst not? For many days to come thou shalt glorify the salvation of Mahâvìra, and explain the nine sacred books. The sage made answer, How shall I with a body feeble as this is do so?

* Cf. First Report, p. 58.

† Compare Bendall, Journey in Nepal, p. 65. Buhler has pointed out in his review of that work that the stotra is well known. Bhandarkar, Report 1882-3, p. 46, has a reference to the story which follows.

The goddess said, In the city called Stambhanaka, on the bank of the Sedhikâ river, in the midst of a thick tangle of palâśa trees, lies Śrî Pârśvanâtha, the self-existent one. Recite our Vedas before him, and you will be well. Thereupon she disappeared. In the morning Abhayadeva told his dream, and accompanied by the Assembly set out for Stambhanaka. At first he had to be carried; but on the way his sickness lessened, and from Dhavalakka he went on foot. Arrived at Stambhanaka the pilgrims began to look for Pârśvanâtha, and by Abhayadeva's directions sought him in the tangled clump of palâśa trees. But the image was not to be seen. Now every day a cow came and dropped its milk above the head of the image. Then the people joyfully told this to the sage. And Abhayadeva coming to the place, so soon as he had seen that sight, begun this hymn, "Jaya tihuyana—" and composed on the spur of the moment thirty-two verses. But the goddess perceived that the last two verses were of awful power to control the gods, and besought him to content himself with the thirty. And he did as she requested. But as Abhayadeva sung the image of Pârśvanâtha rose from the place where it had lain concealed for centuries. The joyful people raised over it a lofty temple, which in due time was consecrated by Abhayadeva, made whole as the goddess had promised.

This is the image of Pârśvanâth still worshipped by the faithful in Cambay (Stambbanaka), which was undoubtedly consecràted by Abhayadeva, however much of the rest of the story we are compelled in an iron age to disbelieve. The stream Sedhikâ still flows past Cambay, though the change of time has removed it from Pârśvanâth's temple. Dhavalakka, where the sage found to his joy that he could already walk on foot, as a pilgrim should, is Dhvolka. I do not know whether Śambhânaka, the place of the dream, can be identified.

Isibhâsiyâim.

The Isibhâsiyâim or Ṛishibhâshitâni, p. 253, is a a text referred to, as Weber, Ind. Stud. xvii., 43, has shown, in the Âvaśyakasûtra viii. 54. Haribhadra there, according to Weber, explains isibhâsiâim by uttarajjhayanâdîni. In another passage of the Âvaśyakasûtra, also referred to by Weber, the Isibhâsyâim and the Uttarajjhayana are referred to as distinct texts.

The Kanâdarahasya of Padmanâbha, and the Nyâyakandalî of Śrîdhara.

The Kanâdarahasya of Padmanâbha, p. 261, and the Nyâyakandalî of Śrîdhara, p. 272, are two works dealing with the Vaiśeshika system of philosophy, which may fitly be taken together.

The first is a commentary by the author on a work styled Râddhânta-muktâhâra, which we learn expounded the doctrine of Kanâda in eighty-one kârikâs. Padmanâbha was, according to the colophon of his book, son of Balabhadra, and younger brother of Viśvanâtha. His mother's name was Vijayaśrî. The information we can extract from this copy of Śrîdhara's book is of great interest. According to the commentator Râjaśekhara, the Supreme Being, taking the form of an owl,* revealed the core of the doctrine† to Kanâda, who thereupon wrote his sûtras. On these sûtras Praśastakaradeva wrote a bhâshya or commentary. The Praśastakaradevabhâshya was itself the theme of no less than four subsequent commentaries. First, the Vyomavatî, by Vyomaśivâchârya. Böhtlingk and Roth have this writer's name with a reference to Hall, p. 166,‡ where it will be found that he is one of the authors named or quoted in a Shaddarśanavritti. The second commentary on Praśastakaradeva's work is our book, the Nyâyakandalî of Śrîdhara. It is not unknown. Bühler in a review of Bendall's "Journey in Nepal" mentions that it first turned up at Jesalmir in 1874, and that our collection contains several copies of the work brought by Bühler from Rajputana and Kashmir. Next comes a commentary called Kiranâvalî by Udayana. Aufrecht has noted a reference to this Kiranâvalî in the colophon of a Tarkabhâshaprâkâśika, Bodl. Cat. No. 606. The Kandalîkâra of the same colophon is, of course, our Śrîdhara; and the last entry there—"Śâlikanâtha in a commentary on the Praśastapadabhâshya"—probably indicates that the list of commentaries on the Praśastakaradevabhâshya which we are considering is not exhaustive. The last of these is the Lîlâvatî of Śrîvatsâchârya. This is doubtless the work which has hitherto been attributed on Colebrooke's authority to a Vallabhâcharya. See Colebrooke's Essays, I., 263, and Weber's description of the book Berlin Cat. No 686. Compare also Aufrecht Bodl. Cat. No. 794, where it will be found that Śrîdhara and the Lîlâvatî are referred to in the same or adjoining contexts.

* This is the bird of Pallas under an eastern sky. The name Aulukya for Kanâda's system is well known. See Weber, Indian Lit, 246, note. Râjaśekhara's explanation is much more picturesque than that of the German savant, who sees in the word ulûka, owl, nothing but a pun on the sage's name Kanâda = crow-eater.

‡ Hall's Contribution towards an Index to the Bibliography of the Indian Philosophical Systems. Calcutta: 1859.

To go back to Praśastakaradeva, the author of the orginal commentary on Kanâda's sûtras, which is the theme of all these books, Hall, p. 64, has conjectured that Praśasta is the name of his book, and that the author's name has been lost. A Praśastabhâshya by Praśasta is, No. 300, among the Nyâya books in Bühler's Collection of 1874-5, Kashmir Report, p. xxvi.

The commentator, Râjaśekharasûri, traces his descent from Jayasinhasûri of the Harshapurîyagachchha, of the stock of Śrî Sthûlibhadra, in the mid śâkhâ, in the gana, renowned through the word, called Kotika, of the tribe of Śrî Praśnavâhana. Jayasinha was succeeded by Abhayasûri, celebrated for his penances. Of every five days he fasted during the first two (shashṭhạm tapas) and the last three (ashṭamam tapas). He abjured the use of the six vikṛitis (butter, milk, curds, oil, sugar and ghee).* His disciples included over a thousand brahmans, besides the Yaksha called Kadamada : and the temple of Vîra in the city Medata was founded by him. Karna, king of Gujarath, perceiving his holy dislike of cleanliness gave him the biruda or honorific title of Maladhâri (The Dirty) He instructed Khengar king of Surâshtra, and so made the deserted path to the shrine of Girnar full of the traffic of pilgrims again, (i.e. he induced the king to lessen or remit altogether the tax levied on pilgrims). By his instruction the minister of the king, Pradyumna, left his four wives, and entered the religious life. After him came Hemachandrasûri, the author of a hundred thousand granthas or verses. He instructed king Siddha, and raised many temples in his own and foreign countries. By his instruction Siddha engraved everywhere on tables of copper his commands that year by year for eighty days life should be sacred.† Chandrasûri and Vibudhendu, who gave up the sovereignty of Lâtadesa to be priests, were of this man's stock in the faith. Munichandra, the sage, who received into the order the Chaulukya king Ânala, succeeded Chandrasûri. Afterwards in the same line rose Devaprabhasûri, the author of a Pândavâyanacharitra and of a Dharmasâraśâstra. He was succeeded by Narachandra, author of a commentary on the Anarghyarâghava, of a commentary on the Kandalî, of a Jyotiḥsâra, and of a Prâkṛitadîpikâ. Narachandra was succeeded by Narendraprabha, author of an Alankâra-mahodadhi and a Kâkutsthakeli. Afterwards arose in his line Śrî Padmadeva, who was succeeded by Tilaka. Our author Râjaśekhara was one of Tilaka's pupils. He mentions, p. 273, that he read this Kandalî with the teacher Jinaprabha.

The Hemachandra and Abhaya of this genealogy cannot be the well-known teachers of that name. Compare Weber, Ind. Stud. xvii. p. 40 note.

A commentary on the Yatijîtakalpa by Sâdhuratna.

The last book I can notice in this list is the Yatijîtakalpa, p. 277, of which the commentator here, Sâdhuratna, gives the following account. The original short Jîtakalpa was written by Jinabhadragani from the Mahâśruta, a term by which is perhaps meant the lost pûrvas. His work was extended (vihitaḥ savyâsaḥ) by Somaprabhasûri. It is afterwards explained that what Somaprabhasûri did was to incorporate with the original book gâthâs from the Niśîthasûtra and other works. On this expanded Jîtakalpa a commentary was written by Somatilakasûri, which, in course of time fell into decay,* and is here written out again by Sâdhuratna at the instance of his teacher Devasundara. The date of his work is Samvat 1656 = A.D. 1600.

A THIRD VISIT TO CAMBAY.

In February 1886, Government kindly sanctioned my absence from College for ten days to enable me to make a short tour in Kathiawar in search of manuscripts. I went first to Cambay. The Dewan Saheb Mr. Shamrao N. Laud, who had promised to advise me of any opportunity that might present itself of completing the work there, had written to tell me that the books in Śântinâth's Temple had become the subject of a law-suit between Nagindass, the hereditary keeper of the collection and the Jain community, adherents of the temple. The books had accordingly been impounded: and the officers of the local High Court had no objections to my looking at them. The opportunity was too good to have been lost, and I am indebted to the Director and to Government for the ready permission given to me to avail myself of it.

As we had suspected, the books not shown to us in 1883 had been, either then or previously, removed to another part of the temple, where they still lay, protected now by the seals of the court. Something was said in my First Report of the strange character of the place, as we then saw it, where for generations these Cambay books have lain undisturbed in their coffin-like boxes. This room was worse. The first thing to catch my eye was a square piece of white cloth extended over the roof exactly above the place where I was to sit. I might have thought it a canopy of honour, had not its real purpose been soon apparent. That part of the roof, and every part of the roof, was covered without an interstice, with bats, hanging down from the rafters, and fastening—so it seemed at least—all their myriad eyes upon me. I sat in that noisome room for four mortal days doing my best to forget the bats, and get on with the work before me. But it was no surprise to myself, or to the friends who were with me on this journey, that the end of my visit to Cambay was an attack of fever which spoiled the rest of my tour.

The list, Appendix I., pp. 3 to 187, and Appendix II., pp. 191 to 243, is, as was the previous list, the work of Mr. Ramchandra Shastri, whom I left at Cambay to draw it up. I have gone carefully over it with him more than once, and proceed now with his assistance to note briefly some of the more important books (Appendix I. pp. 3 to 187).

No. 181. Vardhamânasûri's Upamitibhavaprapanchânâmasamuchchaya.

No. 181 is a handbook or compendium of another work which will itself be noticed later under No. 301. The writer has been already referred to more than once in this Report, and is well known as the priest who officiated at the dedication of Vimalsah's temple on Mount Abu in Samvat 1088 = A.D. 1032. See Klatt's paper in the Indian Antiquary, XI. p. 248, and compare the interesting account which Bhandarkar gives of this teacher in his Report for 1882-3, p. 45. At the end of this copy of the work there are a few simple and pathetic verses by Lîlâ ("Grace") the scribe. She, the daughter of Vellatphalla of the House of Mâlâ, has done this act of piety for her father's greater merit, the repose of her father's soul, as we might say. But she adjures all to whom it may be read to lay hold of the truth it brings, not by hearing only but by doing, when they will find that they have have grasped a Hand not to be reached by the waters of the world in which they are sinkiog.

The copy is not dated, but appears to belong to the Thirteenth Century.

No. 185. Garga Rishi's Karmavipâka with Paramânanda's Commentary.

It may be worth noting that not only does Paramânanda call his author a ṛishi (maharshi), but that Garga or Gagga assumes that title himself in the last verse of his book. Paramânanda describes himself as one of the pupils of an Abhayadevasûri the successor of Śrî Śântisûri. The Abhayadevasûri of this genealogy must again be different from the well-known writer of that name.

No. 186. Hemâchârya's Yogaśâstra.

This copy of part of a well-known book was written out for Devânanda's use (in the lecture room as we are to understand : the scribe must have been one of his pupils) in Samvat 1298=A.D. 1238. This gives as a date for Devânanda, a teacher of whom a reference, which agrees with this date, will be found in the extract given under No. 287 of this list. The reason why here, as in other lists, the first four chapters of Hemachandra's Yogasâstra are found apart from the rest of the book is that they are by long usage set apart for the daily reading of the sûris.

1876. Pârsvanâga's Âtmânuśâsana.

Composed as the last verse tells us in Samvat 1042=A.D. 986. Notice the use of the word " argala " in the date.

195. Udayaprabhasûri's Dhârmâbhyudayakâvya.

Udayaprabhasûri wrote this poem in honour of the great minister Vastupâla, builder of the famous temple of Mount Abu, on an occasion when Vastupâla was at the head of a band of pilgrims about to journey to one or other of the Jain shrines in Western India. A verse in praise of the minister is inserted at the end of each canto after the colophon, and at the end of the book he is celebrated anew in a short separate poem of 36 verses. From the praśasti which follows we learn that the author was a pupil of Sri Vijayasena-sûri whose spiritual lineage is traced to Mahendraprabhu. That teacher was succeeded by Śântisûri, whose victory in argument over the Digambara Jains is glanced at. Śântisûri's pontifical seat was filled by two of his pupils, his joint successors, Ânandasûri and Amara-chandrasûri. Mention is made of the titles of honour "Tiger's cub" and "Lion's cub" granted to these two teachers in their youth by Siddha Râja. They were succeeded by Śrî Haribhadrasûri, here called the Gautama of the Kali age. His successor was the Śrî Vijayasena-sûri who numbered among his pupils the author of our book.

To understand the account which Udayaprabhasûri gives (V. 7) of what led him to write his poem, it is necessary to bear in mind that each of the Jain Tîrthakars is represented as attended by a yaksha and a devî. On the present occasion Vastupâla with those other of the intending pilgrims the auspicious day for whose departure had already come, had left the city and encamped in the outskirts, waiting till the rest should be free to leave. It was during this interval that one night the yaksha and devî of Vastupâla's patron saint appeared to Udayaprabhasûri in a vision, and bade him write this book with their assistance. In it our author apparently acknowledges the co-operation of his friend Śrî Narachandrasûri of the Maladhâri sect. This Narachandra is the author referred to above, p. 28.

No. 204. A Kâlikâchârya-kathâ.

From this version of an oft-told tale I have extracted the passage which gives the writer's account of the establishment of the Vikramâditya and Śaka eras.* The Śaka kings took that name from the Śaka coast or bank. They long reigned happily, defenders of the Jain faith, and themselves students of its doctrine. Then there arose a king of Mâlava named Vikramâditya, who destroyed the house of Śaka. His reign was great and glorious. He established the era called after his name, apparently at the same time with a measure for the relief of all those in debt throughout his dominions. But there arose a Śaka king, who in his turn destroyed the house of Vikramâditya, and when 135 years of the new era had passed away set up his own era in its stead.

No. 215 is a Buddhist work, the only Buddhist book in this old library: and my colleagues in these studies, if I may permit myself that expression, will sympathise with the feelings with which I came upon it. I have already tried to convey to the reader something of that sense of ruin and desolation which must flow into the mind of him who, in this empty temple, turns over these buried records of human faith and love and sorrow. Here in the midst of it all is one solitary survival of a still older faith, of a yet greater religion. I turn the page and read:

Dharmottarâchârya's Commentary on the Nyâyabindu.

Jayanti jâti-vyasana-prabandhaprasûti-hetor jagato vijetuḥ râgâdyarâteḥ Sugatasya vâcho manas-tamas-tânavam âdadhânâḥ.

"The World breeds nothing but a chain of evils that begin with birth: but He has overcome the World. It is He that fighteth for us. His words lighten the darkness of our souls. Glory to Buddha."

In itself the book is one of the greatest interest and importance, and I hope to publish it. Dharmottara's name was already known to us as that of a Buddhist writer on logic, but only from the painfully deciphered records of Tibetan chronicles and Chinese pilgrimages. The recovery of his book is a new justification of the importance which has been attached to these records, as it is a fresh pledge of the inestimable wealth which still lies buried below the surface in India itself.

This work is well known, and is given in the Calcutta edition of the Nandisûtra. The verses preceding the colophon are important. In them Malayagiri himself cites in chronological order the two previous attempts made to throw light on a difficult text. First comes the chûrni of an anonymous author. Then the tîkâ or vṛitti of the incomparable Haribhadra. Chûrni and vritti are alike pleasing compositions. But they are not useful to people of dull intellects. For their behoof Malayagiri has made this further attempt to explain a book which is full of meaning packed into few words. And he makes the world a present of whatever merit may accrue from his performance.

No. 218. Malayagiri's Commentary on the Nandisûtra.

Weber, Ind. Stud. xvii. 20, who had no copy of our book before him, found in the Commentary on the Ganadharasârddhaśata a reference to Haribhadra as the author of a Nandivṛitti.

The passage from the Vichârâmṛitasangraha in which Weber is disposed to see a reference to a Nandivṛitti by Ûmâsvâtivâchaka should I submit be explained differently. In the words: "tathâ châha bhagavân Umâsvâmivâchakaḥ:* Samyagdarśanajnânanachâritrâṇi mokshamârga iti Naṃdivrittau" all the words preceding iti are part of the quotation. This is indicated by the fact that the author goes on to explain the term vâchaka used in part of his quotation. We are dealing then with a quotation from an unnamed work of Umâsvâtivâchaka, standing in a Nandivṛitti, and ascribed there to him. Since writing the above, I have noticed that my conclusion is rendered certain by the fact that the sentence of Umâsvâ âchahaka quoted from a Nandivṛitti actually occurs in the extract from Umâsvâtivachka's Tattvârtha which will be found in the Appendix p. 85.

221, 2. Haribhadrasûri's Upadeśapada.

Upadeśapada is the title of one of the books ascribed by name to the great Haribhadrasûri in the passage quoted by Weber from a commentary on the Ganadharasârdhaśata.† We have, too, in our book itself, an indication, and a deeply interesting one, that our author is that old and famous teacher. It is a common practice among Indian writers, to employ some one test word (anka) which is introduced into the last verse of each division of their work. The last verse of each canto of the Kirâtârjunîya contains the word lakshmî. Mâgha employs the word śrî. In the Naishadhîyacharita every closing verse has in it the word ânanda. Udayaprabhasûri's poem noticed above under No. 195 ends, it will be seen, with the word moksha-lakshmîm, and is called in the colophon Lakshmyankam, the poem that has the word lakshmî for its distinguishing mark.

Haribhadra followed this practice. But the word he uses is not "prosperity" or "fortune" or "joy." It is viraha, "bereavement."

* Correct Umâsvâtivâchakah. Compare Weber's note, Ind. Stud. xvi. 371, and see our extract given under No. 252. Umâsvâmivâchaka would appear to have been in the beginning a mere mistake.

† Indische Studien, xvi. p. 457, note.

And the sorrow, which the poet teacher thus makes perpetual mention of, is the sorrow caused by the death of those two beloved disciples who left him as missionaries of the Jain faith, and were slain in the Bhota country by the fanatical Buddhists they sought to convert.*

No. 229. Haribhadrasûri's Dharmabindu with the commentary of Munichandrasûri.

The commentary here is one of the works which have already been referred to above, p. 12, as written in illustration of the difficult texts of the great Haribhadrasûri by a teacher who died in 1212 A.D. The Dharmabindu is one of the works ascribed by name to Haribhadra in the passage Weber quotes from the commentary on the Gaṇadharasârdhaśata. It is written in Sanskrit, and the last verse contains what we have seen to be Haribhadra's mark, the word viraha. The present copy of the work is almost contemporaneous with Munichandrasûri himself, dated, as it is, only three years after that writer's death.

No. 230. Lakshmana's Sûktâvali.

This is an anthology of 1,000 verses (lakshasûktika) compiled by one Lakshmana. A poet of that name is cited in the Subhâshitâvali, where an example is given. I do not know who the Śrî Vâmadeva is whom Lakshmana puts at the head of his list of poets, p. 55. Aufrecht, p. 135a, says that a writer of that name is quoted by Śankara in his commentary on Śâkuntala. The other poets whom Lakshmana singles out for special praise are Kâlidâsa (whose 'triad of Kâvyas' can raise a mortal to the skies), the incomparable Vâlmîki, Murâri, Subandhu, Bâna, and the Akhyâyikakâras.

No. 252. Umâsvâtivâchaka's Tattvârtha with the commentary of Siddhasonagani.

The teacher (vâchaka) Umâsvâti occupies an illustrious place in Jain annals. His pupil Śyâmârya is said to have died in the year 376, or, according to others, 386 after Vîra. Umâsvâti's best known book is his Tattvârtha with a Bhâshya or commentary by the author himself. An account of a Digambara commentary on a work held in high account by both sects was given in my Second Report, p. 78. No. 252 of the present list is a copy of the Tattvârtha with a commentary by Siddhasenagani. The account of Umâsvâti p 84, is Siddhasena's rendering of a passage in the text of the book itself. The teacher's spiritual descent is first given along two lines, that of the sage at whose hands he obtained consecration, and that of his teacher. His "grandfather" in the faith, according to the first line was Śivaśrî (vâchaka), and his "father" Nandi (kshamana). His teacher's name was Mûla (vâchaka): and his grandfather along that line was the Mahâvâchakakshamana Mundapâda. Umâsvâti's descent according to the flesh follows; and from it we learn that his strange-sounding name is a compound made up of the names of his mother and father. His father Svâti, of the Kaubhîshani gotra, was born in the village Nyagrodhikâ and dwelt (correct विहरता) in Pâtaliputra "otherwise called Kusumapura." His mother Umâ belonged to the Châpsîsuta gotra.

No. 255. Śîlâchârya's Commentary on the Âchârânga-sûtra.

Śîlâchârya—also Śîlânka—is well known as the spiritual preceptor of Vana Râja, founder of the famous city of Anhilwâd Pathan.* Klatt, p. 247 note, observes that Śîlânka's Âchârângavṛitti contains the date of its composition, Śaka 798, but adds that as the verse which contains the date has been added after the colophon of the MS. it seems to be of no great weight. In the Indian Antiquary for March 1886 Fleet has a short note on the date of Śîlâchârya's book in which, from a manuscript in the possession of Bhagvanlal Indraji he shows that a "Gupta" date 772† is given in the interior of the book, and the Śaka date 798, at the end. I cannot at present clear up the apparent confusion here between the Gupta and the Śaka eras, but this Cambay copy of the book, written as it was in Samvat 1327 or A.D. 1271, gives us, I have little doubt, the book's real date in the latter era.‡ It was finished in Śaka 785 or A.D. 863. Fleet's quotation* would seem to show that the word I was unable to decipher in verse 2 is Gambhûtâyâm which he suggests may mean "at Cambay." The verse is numbered 2 in my quotation, but there is no verse No. 1 there. Its place is taken by the prose passage giving the date. The two verses or something corresponding to them would seem to have been inserted at intervals by Śîlâchârya as he slowly completed his commentary.

‡ I was not aware of the Gupta verse when I was at Cambay, and have been unable to get at the book since. I feel tolerably certain that the event will show that whatever else has happened we have not here to deal with, as Fleet supposes, a pedantic desire on the part of this great writer to introduce a mention of an era with which he was only imperfectly acquainted. Śîlâchârya did not write to puzzle scholars of the nineteenth century.

No. 257. Muniratnasûri's Amamasvâmicharitra.

Muniratnasûri begins this poem on the Tîrthakar that is to come with a list of the famous writers of old which yields much that is interesting. First come Gautama and his ten fellow ganadharas, great poets to whom the Teacher gave the "Samasyâ"† of his three words, which they expanded into the twelve angas. Then Śayyambhava, whose Daśakâlika will last till the coming of Duḥprasabhâchârya, the teacher who is to close our fifth spoke of the wheel of time, as Mahâvîra closed the fourth. Śayyambhava is fourth or fifth in the list from Mahâvîra, according as Mahâvîra himself is included or not (Klatt, pp. 246 and 251). He is said to have published the Daśavaikalikâsûtra, which is here called Sarvângamûrtibhrit, at the request of the church, in order that future ages might benefit by the instruction he had himself given to his son Manaka. See the verses quoted by Klatt, p. 251. We have already had in this list No. 222, Tilakâchârya's commentary on this Sûtra, where Śayyaṃbhava is celebrated as the author. Weber, Indische Studien, xvii., p. 77, note 3, finds the year 98 after Vîra given as the date of the composition of the work. From Śayyambhava our author passes to Srî Bhadrabâhu the sûri, from whom the ten niryuktis proceeded as the ten mandalas of the Rigveda came from Śauri (Vishnu). Bhadrabâhu is said to have died in 170 after Vîra (Klatt, p. 246). Next comes Jinabhadra, called Kshamâśramana, who needs not our author's praise. For this writer see Klatt, p. 247. Kielhorn, No. 57, gives an account of a copy in our collection of Kotyâchârya's commentary on the Viśeshâvaśyakabhâshya of Jinabhadraganikshamâśramana. Umâsvâtivâchaka comes next. His words are still ringing in the ears of the world. And Siddhasenadivâkara was a sun (divâkara) that rose in the firmament of the Jain doctrine, putting out all lesser lights. It will not escape notice that our author makes a distinct reference to a Kavirâja as one of the lights that paled at Siddhasena's coming. The next author named is Haribhadra who, by his 1400 works, guarded like a mother the word of the Arhats. Bhadrakîrti, verse 20, is unknown to me. The reference to his writings in the word prenkhattârâganasya perhaps indicates that, like Siddhasena, he was an astronomer. Siddha Ṛishi is praised, v. 21, for his Upamiti, our No. 301. Pâdalipta, v. 22, for his stream of stories called Tarangavatî. We know this book only by name. In the next verse it is said that the sûris Mânatunga and Devabhadra were two swans, whose lake Mânasa was in the minds (mânasa) of Śrî Śatavâhana and Bhoja. It is not expressly stated that all four were contemporary, but this appears to be indicated. The guru of the Gûrjara king, "poet of the good deeds of the 36," of v. 24 is Śîlâchârya. I saw on the occasion of my first visit to Cambay a copy on palm leaf of a Mahâpurushacharitra in Prâkrit which is doubtless the origin of Hemachandra's better known Trishashthiśalâkâpurushacharitra. The Darśanaśuddhi of Chandraprabha to which v. 25 refers is No. 66 of this Cambay List, First Report Ap. p. 51. It is there accompanied by a commentary by Vimalagani, pupil of Dharmaghosha. Dhanapâla is praised, v. 26, for his Tilakamanjarî, a book we have long been in search of.

This list of sacred writers would appear to be closed by verse 27, which is one of general commendation. The verses which follow appear to me to conceal allusions to less well known names, but I am unable to satisfy myself as to the exact references. Râma and Indu are both quoted in the Subhâshitâvali. For Nishkalanka see my Second Report, p. 79. Sajjana's name is known as that of the author of a Kośa which is refered to by Sadânanda in his commentary on the Siddhântachandrikâ. Pîyûshavarshin is known to us as another name for Jayadeva, Second Report, p. 209.

The Praśasti of this book, p. 94, begins with Vîra. The tree of the Kotika gana sprung from the fifth of Vîra's ganadharas, and the Vajramuni Śâkhâ is a branch of that tree. The Chandra gachchha took its rise from that. The teacher Chandraprabha of this last gachchha was the first sûri peculiar to the Pûrnimâ gachchha. He was succeeded by Śrî Dharmaghosha, author of the Śabdasiddhi, and praised by Siddha Râja. Śrî Samudraghosha was appointed by Dharmaghosha to succeed him. King Naravarman in Dhârâ, the king of Gohrada, Siddha Râja, listened to Samudraghosha with pleasure, as he spoke in the assembly of learned men. In his miraculous gifts he rivalled Gautama, and the other ganadharas of old. He had three pupils, the first and chief of whom was Sûri Sûraprabha famed in Avantî land. A second was our author Śrì Muniratnasûri, skilled in the seven sciences of Siddhânta (the canon), Sâhitya, Pada (grammar), Pramâna (logic). and the Jyotish Śâstra in its three branches. A third pupil of Samudraghosha was Śrî Tilakachandra Sûri. Sûraprabha died, and Jinasinhasûri was by Muniratnasûri appointed to succeed him. Muniratnasûri at the same time named his own successor, Jineśvara, and shone between these two young sûris as Meru when Sun and Moon are shining at the same time on its eastern and western slopes, or as a chariot between two spirited horses.

No. 260. Âsada's Vivekamanjarî.

There are several copies of this book in the list. Here it is accompanied by the commentary of Bâlachandra from which I extract the following information with regard to Âsada and his work. The poet Âsada called Kaviśâbhâśringâra, was one of the disciples of that Abhayadevasûri who succeeded śrî Bhadreśvarasûri, who succeeded Devendra. This Bhadreśvarasûri would appear to have written a Remedium Amoris of a religious kind, as he is called a 'cage for the protection of those who fly in terror from the darts of love,' and to have been celebrated as the founder of a great temple of Mahâvîra in Gujarat.

At the end of his commentary p. 101, Bâlachandra gives some very interesting details about the book. Katukarâja of the śrî Bhillalâma race and Analadevî his wife had two sons Âsada and Jâsada. Âsada lit up again the lamp of Kâlidâsa's fame with the oil of his commentary on that writer's Meghadûta.* This was for him the title of Kavisabhâśringâra. He was the author also of several jinastotras and jinastutis that were so many incantations to deaden the poison of the snake called works. And in the book Upadeśakandalî he furnished for all travellers in the way of salvation a stock of "provisions for the road," (viaticum) that could never give out.

Âsada, like Śiva (as if some such justification were thought desirable), had two wives, Pṛithivîdevî and Jaitalladevî. By the latter he had two sons, the elder called Râjada and the younger called Jaitrasinha. By Pṛithivîdevî he had one son Arisinha, who is described by an epithet gurugiriparinayakarmâ which appears to contain, along with the sense in which it is applicable to gaja in the same line, some reference to his marriage.

Asada's son Râjada, straight as the stalk of a young plantain tree, and known already for his learning as the young Sarasvatî, went to the heavenly city, and our book is the poet father's In Memoriam, the themes being taken from the very words with which the teacher Abhayadeva sought to win him from his grief.

With regard to his commentary on the book Bâlachandra tells us, p. 103, verse 13, that he composed it at the urgent request of Âsada's other son by Jaitalladevî, the minister Jaitrasinha. For himself Bâlachandra was the reigning sûri, sishyapraśishyâvadhi (third in descent from) of śrî Haribhadrasûri, whom the pious woman Ratnaśrî had reared as her son in the faith. Vijayasenasuri of the Nâgendra gachchha and śri Padmasûri of the Vṛihadgachchha joined in correcting Bâlachandra's book, verse 14. And his helper throughout the book was Pradyumnasuri pupil of śrî Kanakaprabha. May the work endure and be read so long as Time, the Scribe of the Creator, shall from night to night, with the Heavenly River for his pen and the moon for his inkpot, write the scroll of the stars on the parchment of Heaven.

Before leaving Bâlachandra we may note that in addition to the present work he wrote a commentary on one other at least of Âsada's compositions, the Upadeśakandalî referred to already as mentioned here in verse 8, p. 102. No 6 of Kielhorn's catalogue is an Upadeśakandalîvṛitti by Balâchandra, in fragments of about 250 leaves.

No. 266. Vâmanâcharya's Sûtrapatha, Unâdi and Lingânusasana.

That the grammarian Vâmana was not an orthodox Brahmin was acutely conjectured by the Benares editor of the Kâśikâ vṛitti, Pandit Bâlaśastri from indications furnished by that work itself, and Kielhorn has recently reminded us that Vâmana composed a Lingânuśâsana in 34 Âryâs "which seems still to exist.*" Here is the book and the proof. For the Linganuśâsana by Vâmana, pp. 111-114, which I have given complete, (dele "Ends" p. 114) is in 31, not 37, âryâ verses, of which the first is an invocation to the Complete and Perfect One.

I must not forget to note that this first edition of a lost book cannot claim to be a perfect rendering of the author's work. I had so many emendations, more or less certain, to propose, that it seemed likely to be less distracting if I departed from the practice, observed everywhere else in this List, and gave a text as I think it ought to be, rather than the text of my transcript. The book however gave me great trouble: and it is due to my own shastri Râmchandra and to Râjaram Shastri of the Elphinstone College that the text before the reader is as good as it is. Meanwhile the printing of the rest of the List forged ahead, and I am obliged to present the material for correcting our judgment, where we have gone astray, or for suggesting new emendations, in a note which I must place here instead of in its proper place.†

Hemachandra's Lingânuśana, notes that Aufrecht found a reference to a Linganuśâsana by Vâmana in Râyamukuta's commentary on the Amarakośa. I have not been able to find where Kielhorn got the statement as to the number of verses.

The writer gives the Chândra grammar, along with those of Vyâdi, Vararuchi and Jinendra, a prominent place in his list of the authorities he followed, p. 113, verse 9, and in the third âryâ he uses, it will be noticed, the technical term chârtha, which Kielhorn has recently told us was Chandra's word for dvandva * Kielhorn mentions this in a paper written to show that the compilers of the Kâśikâ diligently used Chandra's grammar. All this helps to prove that our writer is the same as the author, or joint author of the Kâśikâ. And the form into which this "handbook on genders" has been thrown, supports the identification of the grammarian Vâmana with the poet of that name.†

No. 301. Siddharshi's Upamitibhavaprapañchâ.

This is the same work as Kielhorn's No. 7. The Cambay copy gives the real name of the author, and shows that the date 962 (Kielhorn p. vii. note) is that of the composition of the work. Siddha dictated it in that year to a female disciple called Gaṇâ.

I must close here this rapid review of my list of the palm-leaf MSS. in Śântinath's temple, Cambay. While glad that I have had the good fortune to accomplish an object which the officers of the Bombay Search have had at heart for years, I am well aware that what I have been able to do will serve only to what the curiosity of scholars in India and in Europe, intent on piercing the darkness which surrounds the beginnings of the Jain religion. It would be wrong to say that this Cambay Collection is unique, while we have not as yet been able to penetrate to the same extent the recesses of that library at Anhilwad Pathan which holds in its grip the books of the great Hemachandra. But the intrinsic value of these Cambay books will be patent to every scholar. Ex pede Herculem. Now they lie in darkness, the jealously-guarded charge of people who are unable to read them, and whose only merit in the matter—though no slight merit it is—is that they have kept them so well. The books are an heirloom of the temple in which they lie. They belong to no individual, not even to any individual generation of the Jains of Cambay. I would fain hope that means may be devised by the leaders of the Jain community in Bombay and elsewhere to induce the Cambay Jains to make their treasures accessible to the world. They need not fear the result. For as these old records advance slowly into the light it is becoming every day more and more apparent that Vîra and his disciples are worthy peers of Buddha and his followers, in the long list of the World's seekers after truth. I do all I can, now, though I shall lose no opportunity that may present itself of doing more, when I say that there is no public library in Europe which would not give these books an hononred place in its shelves, and invite scholars from far and near to profit by them.

The paper manuscripts in the same Collection, pp. 191 to 243, though not of course so old or valuable, present many features of interest, which I must, however, review more briefly. One book of the first importance is the Angavijjâ, which was, I believe, unknown until I lit upon it in Cambay. Subsequently Mr. Bhagvandas Kevaldas heard of a second copy of the work on palm-leaf, which is apparently the copy from which the transcript now in the temple was made. The owner had some inkling of the historical importance of the book, and I had to pay a large price to secure it, as I eventually did, for the University Gondal Collection.* A copy from it will be placed in my Collection for Government, 1886-7. I had hoped to exhibit the Gondal MS. at the late Vienna Congress,† and when I found that I should not be able to go to Europe, I made it over, at his request, to Bhandarkar

* In 1885, His. Highness Bhagvat Singhji, Thakore Saheb of Gondal, offered to the University of Bombay a sum of Rs. 6,000 for the formation of a University collection of Sanskrit MSS. At the meeting of the Senate at which this offer was accepted with thanks, the Chairman, Mr. Latham, Dean-in-Law drew special notice to the endowment as being of a kind much wanted in the University, which, he hoped, would lead to more of the same kind. The growth of the Collection must be slow, as the interest only of the main sum (Rs 5,000) is available from year to year. His Highness very generously added another Rs. 1,000 to his original offer with leave to expend it as opportunity offered in forming the nucleus of the Collection. We have made a good beginning with a palm-leaf copy of an Uttarâdhyayanaṭîka, some Vedic books, and this Angavijjâ. I hope the time is not far off when private citizens will make it their ambition to give the Bombay University as good a Collection, starting witht he Gondal MSS., as they have at Oxford or Berlin.

† I do not know that any one has noticed—certainly no one in Bombay has noticed—that the three communications from absent scholars read at the first session of the Aryan section of the Congress at Vienna were all from Bombay. "Herr Prof. Dr. G. Buhler legt vor: 1. Specimen des Atharvavedabhâshya von S. P. Pandit; 2. Lingânuśâsana des Vâmanâcârya von Dr. P. Peterson, 3. einen Vortrag des Dr. Bhagvanlâl Indrâji: 'On two Chalukya-Inscriptions.' Den drei Verfassern wird der Dank der Section votirt."

This speaks well, I think, for the state of Sanskrit studies among us.

for that purpose. The attention of scholars has therefore already been prominently drawn to this important book.

The Anekântajayapatâkâ of Haribhadrasûri, p. 191, has been, by Bhandarkar, Report, 1882-3, p. 47, wrongly ascribed to Abhayadeva. Munichandra's Commentary on it has been already referred to. The Padmacharitra of Vimalasûri, p. 194, will I believe turn out to be an important find, if, as seems to me probable, the Vimala of this poem is the author of the Praśnottararatnamâlâ. A reference to our Index of Books will show that the Cambay Palm-Leaf Library contains no less than ten copies of that work. My attention was lately called to it while drawing up the preface to my edition of the Hitopadeśa. It does not seem to me to be doubtful that the verse in the Hitopadeśa प्रियवाक्सहिंत दांन is in that book a quotation from Vimala's Praśnottararatnamâlâ, where it stands in its own context, so to say, as one of a series of answers to a series of questions. I had at first hoped to find a useful datum for the age of the Hitopadeśa in a circumstance which has of course already attracted attention * But it does not seem possible at present to fix Vimala's date, or even to say with certainty to what religious sect he belonged, and in all probability he is earlier than references we already have for the Hitopadeśa. The Vimala who wrote this book was pupil of Vijaya, who was pupil of Râhu. Vijaya's name as that of an old teacher occurs in the praśasti of the Rayamallâbhyudayakâvya (p. 256 of Appendix, v. 86). Bhandarkar has a copy of the book with a praśasti, an examination of which will probably clear up these points. If this Padmacharitra or Râmacharitra is really the work of the Buddhist author of the Praśnottararatnamâlâ, its importance for the history of the Indian epics can hardly be exaggerated. The Mohaparâjayanâṭaka, p. 208, has been noticed by Kielhorn, No. 50.

Ramâlamṛita.

The reader will not at first recognise the Adamahavâ of this curious book, to whose favour in v. 3 the proficiency of the Yavanas in an art of magic is ascribed. They are Adam and Eve. Mr. E. Tyrrell Leith informs me that the Ramal method of divination is common in Bombay, and has kindly furnished me with the following short account of it as witnessed by himself:—

* See Weber's paper on the Praśnottararatnamâlâ reprinted in his Indische Streifen, Vol I, p. 210 fg.

"Magic, according to the learned among the Sunni Mussalmans, is classified as Ar-Rouhani (supernatural) and Ar-Simya (natural). The former falls again into two classes, viz. rahmáni (divine) and shaitáni (devilish). My fortune-teller claimed to employ only divine magic. Ramal is, strictly speaking, Geomancy, from ramal (sand); but the term is loosely employed in this Presidency so as to include divination by throwing dice (Kábatain), and the fortune-teller who uses that mode is here called rammál. Eight dice are ordered by him of a goldsmith, according to the information given me. These have the appearance of brass, and are rather smaller than the dice generally used in Europe. They are said, however, to be composed of seven metals, viz. pital (brass), jest (pewter), lohá (iron), shisa (lead), chándi (silver), sona (gold), and tamba (copper.) The fortune-teller gives the goldsmith instructions as to the proportions in which the various metals are to be combined. A bar of the alloy is made, weighing 8 tolas, and is cut into 8 cubes of equal size respectively. The dice must be made on the Nauroz in the month of Posh. They must be all completed between the hours of 4 p.m and 8 p. m. There are said to be three works in general use, which give particulars as to the process of manufacture, viz. Ilme Jafar, Zakhirat-al-Ramal and Makhzam-al-Ramal. No formulas are recited by the fortune-teller, but during that process when actually engaged in divination he repeats a verse from the Korán. The dice are strung on two short iron rods—four on each rod; and arranged so that 2 is opposite to 4 and 3 is opposite to 3 The other sides and numbers are not used. The accompanying rough sketch will show the way in which the dice are strung together.

"The modus operandi is as follows. The fortune-teller gives the enquirer both sets of dice into his hand, and then asks that they may be returned to him. On receiving them back, he tosses them lightly in his hand and repeats the name of Allah, together with the following passage from the Korán :—

Kalu, Subhánaka lá 'ilma laná illá má 'allamtaná, innaka ant ul-'alim ol-hakim.

"He then then throws the two sets of dice on the ground, so that they fall close beside and paralled to one another. He next looks at the numbers which appear uppermost, and makes a calculation in pencil on a piece of paper. Finally, he requests the enquirer to put any questions he may choose."

The Pârasîprakâśa, p. 219, written by Krishṇadâsa at the request of the Emperor Akbar, is an earlier work than the book of the same name to which Bhandarkar Report, 1882-3, p. 34, calls attention. The copy of the Śrutabodha, p. 225, discloses the real name of yet another book which has been wrongly attributed to Kâlidâsa.

It has already been said that my work at Cambay was followed by an illness which prevented me from making any profitable use of the remainder of the leave afforded to me. I had reached Bhownuggur before the fever showed itself, and I was able to pay a flying visit to the holy mount Śatrunjaya on my way back to Bombay. But I had to leave Kathiawar without visiting, as I had intended, Valabhi and Girnar, Somnath and Dvarka, places some of which are probably as important for the search as they are all of them of entrancing interest to the antiquarian. I hope I may soon have another and a better opportunity of visiting the shrines of Kathiawar. Meanwhile I had the great privilege and pleasure of an interview at Bhownuggur with the venerable Gowrîshankar, a statesman who can speak of his personal intercourse with Sir John Malcolm, a Vedântist who shortly afterwards quitted the world, and, in the yellow robes of the ascetic, entered on the philosophic meditation upon death. This deeply interesting old man received me kindly, and evinced the greatest interest in my mission. His son, Mr. Vajeshankar Gowrishankar, showed me his admirable collection of antiquities, already well known to European scholars. Great credit is due to H. H. the Mahârâja for the liberal patronage bestowed on archæological and antiquarian research in Bhownuggur.*

* Mr. Vajeshankar has issued Part I. of a Selection of Inscriptions with a Preface from which it appears that His Highness Mahârâja Sir Takhtsinhaji G.C.S.I., sanctioned in 1881 the establishment of a Department for an Archæological and Antiquarian Survey—the first of its kind started in Kathiawar. I venture to suggest that the time is propitious for extending this scheme, and making it an Antiquarian Survey of Kathiawar, in which all the states of the peninsula shall join. Such a scheme is sure beforehand, I feel certain, of the cordial sympathy and support of the present Political Agent in Kathiwar, Col. Watson. Any occasional help I could render would be cheerfully given. But in

It only remains to express my fresh sense of obligation for the efficient and hearty services rendered to me in this search by Messrs. Bhagvandas Kevaldas and Ramchandra Shastri. From Pandit Durgaprasad too I have, during the period under report, received occasional assistance, which has been very acceptable. I have also again to thank the Committee of the Bombay Branch, Royal Asiatic Society, for permitting this Report to appear as an extra Number of the Society's Journal, and for a contribution of Rs. 400 towards the expense of its publication.

the Principal of the new Samaldas College at Bhownuggar, Mr. R. H. Gunion, late scholar of Lincoln College, Oxford, and Professor of Sanskrit in University College, London, the Administrations have on the spot a scholar of proved capacity, who would bring to the work all the learning indispensable for the task, and all the energy necessary to carry it through. Much has of course been done in Kathiawar, but the explorers whose success there has been greatest will be the first to admit that probably more remains to do. If the Native States were to organise and maintain for five years a Survey of the kind I have suggested, I venture to think that no long time would pass before most important results would be obtained, and that at the end of the period Kathiawar, which has been classic ground in India since history began, would be found to have anew rendered up secrets it has kept for two thousand years.
